“THE fierce pull of a vocation makes up people’s minds almost without their consent.” Thus writes Jana Wendt, a television journalist for more than 30 years, in the introduction to her book, Nice Work, about workers in various professions around Australia. Wendt, a subject of vocational pull herself, interviews everybody from a maverick priest, a scandal-ridden CEO and an anthropologist, bringing to her writing the forensic questioning and fierce intelligence she has always shown as a journalist. Nice work, but shame about the boring cover.
